A Romance of the Hall.

They came into the car at a wayside station together. She was in the lead, a position she is not likely to surrender as long as they travel together. A tall brunette, with a sharp nose, piercing black eyes, hair black as a raven's wing, a long, straight nose, with a mole on the side of it, a month, the cut of which belatedly determined the fact. She had passed the shaly side of the rocks and climbed to the apex of a quarter of a century. He was a quiet youth, over whose low-colored head some vigorous sunbeams had passed, an innocent bobbingly just released from a mother's apron strings. On him she cast hering glances, and his face, suffused with blushes, was turned with a timid, appealing look to her.

The car was crowded, and seats not easily obtainable. About the middle of the car a solitary traveler occupied a seat to himself. Whether the traveler rose, and with such courtesy invited her to take a seat next the window, and when she was seated he calmly suggested himself upon the vacant half of the chair. By this time the man whom she was watching had come up. He placed his hand on the back of the seat, looked apprehensively on the face of his protector and timidly around the car. He was evidently embarrassed, and did not know what to do with himself. The abruptness of the man's appearance traveler by her side with a sharpness that almost amounted to malignity.

But the traveler seemed all unconscious of the scrutiny to which he was subjected, and looked away over the fields through the opposite window.

The brunette could no longer endure to see her colored being standing before her, and she adressed the seat at her side, whose eyes were square and clear as the sky. "I am sorry," she said, "but my seat is here."

"Well, my dear," responded the solitary traveler, "I am sorry to see you here."

seat is here."
